

LEADING CHANGE AT WORK

UK businesses are missing out on the growth opportunities that come with hybrid working

A survey of 1,000 workers and 250 decision makers across the UK and Ireland reveals that:

Workers are 4% more productive in a hybrid setting – equivalent to an additional €39 billion to the UK & Irish economy compared with pre-pandemic ways of working.

This boost is a result of increased productivity levels associated with improved worker satisfaction and reduced commuting time.

However, this potential growth has not been realised, as 34% of UK and Irish businesses don't offer hybrid work.

51% of decision makers would like to mandate a full-time return to the office, yet 66% of workers prefer some form of hybrid working set-up.

Companies run the risk of hampering future growth if they ignore the potential productivity uplift associated with hybrid work. Supporting people to work flexibly will help businesses unlock significant financial gains, while creating a happier and more fulfilled workforce. However, a hybrid work policy is futile without implementing the technology required to facilitate collaboration between colleagues and customers, wherever they are.

The office remains an essential environment for social collaboration and building a strong workplace culture. But spaces must be designed with idea sharing and creativity in mind, as well as digital functions that are essential to ensure easy communication with those working remotely.

For more insights into how to adopt hybrid working for the benefit of your business and people, visit www.ricoh.co.uk/insights imagine. change.

RICOH

#LeadingChangeAtWork